The National Intelligencer, April 18, 1838

The death of Mrs. Chloe Lee Carr, widow of the late Overton Carr, of this city has left on the minds of her surviving friends impressions of regret, felt the more keenly in proportion to their knowledge of her estimable qualities; and one who has known her long and intimately cannot but give this passing tribute to her memory.

She was mild and considerate to all; unobtrusive and retiring in her acts of benevolence; calm and undeviating in her course of duty; and, whether we remember her as a wife, a mother, or a sister, we always find the same self devotion, and untiring affection.

Deeply impressed with the heavenly doctrines of her Savior, she offered an inspiring example in her practical illustrations of them through life; and this now affords to her orphan children the only consolation under which they bow to the bereavement of both father and mother in the short space of one month.
